

Women's Review of Books

What is Women's Review of Books?

Founded in 1983 at the Wellesley Centers for Women, Women's Review of Books is a tabloid-format book review publication, which appears bimonthly. As the only publication devoted solely to reviewing books by and about women, it is an influential voice in the field of women's writing.

What does Women's Review of Books publish?

We specialize in in-depth, essay-style reviews of recently published women's studies books, and literary fiction, poetry, and memoir by women. We also offer photography, comics, and poetry.

What kind of advertising does it carry?

As a book review publication, we carry ads from university presses, trade houses, and small presses across the US, Canada, and overseas.

Other advertisements announce academic faculty and staff vacancies across North America, the UK, and Australia, as well as journals, conferences, literary prizes, calls for papers, vacation opportunities, writers' and artists' workshops, and editorial and other services.

Both boxed, display advertisements (run alongside the editorial text), charged by the column inch, and classified section (line) advertisements, charged by the word, are available in each issue.

Why advertise in Women's Review of Books?

Women's Review of Books offers advertisers access to a targeted, motivated consumer market of opinion shapers and cultural gatekeepers, women who use the information they get from us to speak, to write, and to act on their convictions in their communities. Our readers buy books, seek academic faculty and staff positions, attend academic and professional conferences, and travel widely. They tell us that they rely on the advertising as well as the editorial features in our pages to stay informed. A multiyear survey of subscribers found that eighty percent of our subscribers buy twenty or more books every year, and that sixty-four percent had responded to ads they saw in WRB in the past year.
